Teaching the law in 2011

Many of you may be aware that there is a new University Policy (the Coursework Academic Programs Policy) which will soon apply to all Law School courses. That policy requires that students enrolled in a 3 unit course have a minimum of 36 hours of "structured learning activities" each semester, and that students enrolled in a 6 unit course have at least 72 hours of structured learning activities each semester. Complying with this policy will require changes to the structure of some of our courses.

During the planning day on Friday 18 February we will spend some time considering what types of structured learning activities will best complement our existing courses, and how the "Teaching the Law" seminar series can be used to assist individual academics to develop and implement those structured learning activities.

In order to ensure this is a constructive discussion it would be useful if you would spend some time before the planning day considering whether there are any particular online teaching tools or other learning activities in which you are particularly interested, and how those activities might fit with your existing course. These thoughts will direct our planning day discussion and hopefully ensure the 2011 seminar series is of practical assistance to us all!

I look forward to our first (informal) 'Teaching the Law' seminar for 2011!

Time: Teaching and Learning session, Adelaide Law School Planning Day

Date: 18 February 2011